We rarely find in a newspaper a better composition than the following piece of theatrical criticism. Articles so well written, deserve to be copied for the effect they have in improving the public taste; but the article before us possesses the more interest as it treats of the merits of a man celebrated in his profession. who, we understand, is about to visit our country.

FROM THE LONDON OBSERVER.

DRURY LANE.

Othello:—Mr. Kean and Mr. Booth.

It falls to our lot to speak of Mr. Booth as matched with the actor he has chosen to imitate; (for to a certain extent we are persuaded that he has imitated Mr. Kean.) There is something daring in this wrestle of talent, particularly as one of the parties has been tried, and found to be a powerful creature. From what we saw on Thursday evening, we are convinced that Mr. Booth is a very clever young man—as young men go: that he will be an acquisition to the new school of playing, and may do much towards shewing that there ought to be but little difference between the parties before the lamps and behind them; and that Mr. Kean is one of those fine and fiery spirits that stand, as it were, upon the heart of nature, and control its pulsations. Mr. Kean's Othello, on this occasion, was one of the most surprising achievements that genius ever perfected. We will venture to assert that there never was a grander and more pathetic piece of acting on the English stage; of course on no other stage. He seemed to feel he was put on the race, like a blood-horse, and to take a pleasure in the struggle, and a justifiable pride in the success of his endeavors. Mr. Booth was matched to run against him; at least we know that many persons had made the knack of Mr. Booth an argument against the genuine talent of Mr. Kean; but Kean beat his antagonist hollow. He played Othello from his very soul, and he sent the fierceness and misery of the Moor into the hearts of all his hearers. Kean played himself into a state of exhaustion more than once. His face was a mirror to his heart; and all its shades of terror and suspicion flitted over it, like Banquo's shadows. Mr. Kean's style of acting is of the same quality with Lord Byron's style of poetry; it is magnificently ferocious when in a state of violent excitement—fearfully pathetic in unexpected passages, and mysteriously attractive in general. In Bertram, (Maturin's tragedy) he was the Corsair himself, the same furious pirate, the same terrific lover, the same outcast at heart from all his kindred and kind, with the like broken fortune and bewildered hopes, and with a similarity in rash projects, daring deeds, and withered feelings. Kean's Bertram, though a direct nonentity in the way of morals or pure high-mindedness, was a fine bold picture of an ardent and warlike nature, wrecked on the storm of its own feelings, and wandering about on the shore of the world, desolate, and proud, and savage—hating the earth, and trusting not the heavens; pursuing man with the fierceness of a tyger, and hoarding up in his bosom the remains of his shattered passion, like a miser. Bertram, like all the heroes of Lord Byron's tales, would be despised and hooted from our presence, if he had not a mystery in his air that betokened a mental superiority over his kind, and a certain fulness of personal courage. Mr. Kean always played Othello with a beautiful earnestness; but on the other evening, he seemed to feel his fame snatched at by a stranger hand, and the consequence was, that he put forth all his energies, and arose on the wings of genius, like an eagle, above his opponent. Who shall now say that Mr. Kean is not a man of the fullest genius? He makes "the breath of glory real!" There was no art: (or if there was we could not discern it)—no feebleness, except from excess of exertion, and then such an exhaustion is the perfection of agitated feeling; no unmeaning turbulence in his representation of Othello: he trusted himself to the power of his enthusiasm, and it did not betray him. Othello is of all others the character for Kean. It is pregnant with bursts of the deepest pathos and the wildest passion. It is full of gusto.—What in English poetry, for a certain grandeur of characteristic feeling, can go beyond that sudden thought of desolation in Othello, when he finds that Desdemona's faithlessness has stricken down all love of glory and the world. Othello is a noble personification of an eastern battle. A sunlike being habited in golden robes, with a turban and sabre; the love of war being the very passion in him—a part of his nature. Mr. Kean proved his genius by his manner of delivering that most touching passage, "Oh! now farewell forever! &c." What a spirit of soul felt partiality there is in the recollections of "The ear piercing fife," "the plumed troop," the neighing steed, the cannon, the drum! What a pride, pomp, and circumstance of war! And all hurled down! Kean wrought the house into a breathless silence by his utter loneliness of heart on the delivery of this passage. And a dead quiet of this kind is deeper applause than the shouts of forty nations joined together. His voice seemed to be going away for ever. You felt alone after he had spoken. It was too pathetic for words or thoughts or tears:—It was.

We have seen Mr. Kean in Othello four times before this representation; but like Caius Marcius, "he outdid himself doubly" in the last struggle. Kean fought the Corioli battle of his fame on Thursday.—He hath disciplined all other actors soundly. We are glad we are not on the stage at this day; for we hate to be deficient in complete success, in any great pursuit; and there is no getting above Kean. He will be king, and there is no saying nay to him. Shakespeare has said, that "if two men ride upon one horse, one must ride behind," and Mr. Booth must have found the truth of this by the present time.

It is principally to Baron Larry that military surgery owes its present state of perfection; before his time, the wounded were never thought of until the battle was over, the surgeons wisely keeping their stations, at least a league in the rear of the army; the humanity of Napoleon, aided by the Baron suggested the mode of dressing their wounds on the field of battle, when the cases required it; he also invented cars for transporting the moment they fell, by which he saved many thousand valuable lives, which may easily be conceived, when it is known that he was Napoleon's principal military surgeon in all his campaigns, from the commencement of his career to the battle of Waterloo, when the Baron's usual intrepidity and zeal was nearly fatal to him; for he received a severe wound in the head, fell, and remained two days on the field of battle, and, when discovered, was taken for Napoleon, being very like him, when he again ran the risk of his life from ignoble vengeance. On his return to Paris, the king stripped him of all his power, but it would have had the appearance of injustice to entirely lay aside the first military surgeon in the world—therefore his most christian majesty has most graciously pleased to suffer him to continue his functions as surgeon in chief of the military hospital of the royal guard. His loss, besides his practice, from the paternal regulations of the most christian majesty, is 1200*l.* per annum.

FROM THE MADRAS COURIER.

On Wednesday, the 28th of Feb. as three young gentlemen were shooting near Killanour, (Killanour is 10 miles from Pondicherry, on the Tindevenum road) a villager informed them that a woman had been torn about two hours before by a Tiger, and said he would show them the Jungle to which he had returned; they accordingly went with him. Several villagers followed with tomtoms; they were not long in finding the remains of the woman's clothes, with a basket and some grass which she had been gathering. The villagers soon roused him: in passing from one part of the Jungle to another, he caught one of them and tore him very severely; the great noise made at the time caused him to let go his hold, and retire to a large bush on the edge of a tank. The gentlemen then surrounded the place, but not supposing he was there, from his being so quiet, one of them went to look in, when he rose from the middle of a bush, with a dreadful roar, leapt upon a villager, and threw him a considerable distance; while in the act of leaping, he received a ball in his hinder quarter which laid him on his back, but he still kept hold of the man; in this position, he got another in his shoulder, which made him furious: the third gentleman then ran up and sent a charge of shot through him, a spear shackled him to the ground, while villagers (one or two for the others had made the best use of their legs) thumped his head with large sticks, which soon put an end to his existence. He was more than seven feet from his nose to the end of his tail: to judge from the condition he was in he must have made great depredations in this neighbourhood.

The man, who was last caught, had his arm so very much shattered, that I am afraid he will never be able to use it, the animal having the greatest part of his arm with part of his side in his mouth at the same time. AN EYE WITNESS.

HORRIBLE SELF IMMOLATION.

SALEM, Sept. 16. We understand that one of the papers brought in the Bengal, contains an account of two females being recently burnt on the funeral pile of their deceased husband, near Calcutta. The British government, it is said, interfered to prevent it; but finally a compromise was made, that no force, or binding of the limbs, should be used, but that the women should after the fire was kindled, be left to their own free will. The consequence was, that the elder first threw herself into the flames; and afterwards the younger, about 17 years of age, applauding the conduct of the other, followed her horrible example, and the bodies of husband and wives were consumed together amidst crowds of their fellow beings.

A short time since, the Diligence, between Bordeaux and Thoulouse, was robbed. It was effected by one man, who had placed figures stuffed with straw on the road-side. It now appears that the travellers who were robbed, brought an action against the proprietor of the Diligence; and the Tribunal of Agen, before whom the cause came, has awarded them every sous of their loss. The amount was 6000 francs.

ANECDOTE.

Mr. Niles commences his editorial address in the 13th volume of his Register by the following anecdote and reflection:—

It is the advice of a sage, "never to speak until you have something to say"!—meaning, that we should reflect before speaking. This good advice is too often wilfully neglected, if we may judge by the proceedings of Congress and other legislative bodies; and, sometimes, perhaps, set aside by peculiar circumstances, in which a person is apparently compelled to speak. I have been told that our celebrated advocate, Luther Martin, Esq. attending the General Court at Annapolis, discovered that the copy of a certain paper recorded in Baltimore County Court was wanting, for the success of a cause in which he was engaged, when the trial had begun: an express was despatched, and he undertook to employ the Court until the desired copy could be had—the distance between the places is thirty miles. He did so, and amused and instructed the Court and the bar by a flood of law knowledge, which though it did not always bear upon his case, was not sufficiently irrelevant to cause him to be checked. He was in the midst of a learned exposition of a great point at the moment that the official copy was put into his hands; and, at once breaking off his argument, he said, "and please your Honors, here is the very thing that I have been speaking for." The paper was read by a junior lawyer: and it must be acknowledged "he spoke to some purpose," for he gained the cause.

Worthy of Imitation.—A short time past the wife of an overlooker of a farm in the neighbourhood of Charlottesville, gave birth to FOUR FINE CHILDREN; the mother and all of whom, a few days since, were doing well. The communicator also understood from a gentleman in Charlottesville, that a subscription paper had been handed about for the benefit of the little family, and that between three and four hundred dollars had been subscribed. *Rich. FRIDAY OCTOBER 3, 1817.

INDEPENDENT NOMINATION.

For GOVERNOR,
Gen. JOSEPH HIESTER.

SENATE,
JOHN GILMORE, of Butler.

ASSEMBLY,
WILLIAM WILKINS,
JOHN ROBINSON, of Elizabeth township
Col. JOHN ROSS, (St. Clair)
WILLIAM AYRES, of Butler.

COMMISSIONER,
ALEX. LOGAN,

AUDITOR,
HENRY BEITZHOOVER.

"It falls to our lot (says the Connecticut Mirror,) this day to record the complete success of the democratic party in this State. A majority of between 40 and 50 in the house, and between 1000 & 2000 votes for their council ticket, attest their triumph. To our friends abroad it may be unexpected; but those who have watched the course of things in this State, for some time past, cannot be surprised."

FIFTEENTH CONGRESS.

The Elections to the Fifteenth Congress are now completed in every State in the Union, except in one or two districts of Massachusetts, where there have been several unsuccessful attempts to make a choice. The changes are more numerous than at any preceeding election, for it is believed that two thirds of the Members of the present House of Representatives have never sat in Congress before. Of the old members not returned, it is believed nearly one half declined a re-election. The defeat of the remainder is in a degree attributable to the Compensation Law, but not as generally as some have supposed. Several of the warmest opponents of that law have lost their seats by large majorities.

DISTRESSING.---The Erie paper of Sept. 20, states, that The sloop Nautilus, Fiddle, master, was upset in a gale on Friday night the 12th inst. about 10 or 12 miles from land. Her crew consisting of 5 or 6 men held on to her until Saturday evening when she had drifted within a few rods of the Peninsula, one of them Cyrenius Metcom was then drowned in attempting to swim to the shore.

INSOLENCE.

Yesterday a writ of habeas corpus was issued by the Hon. Judge Lewis to bring before him a man named Thomas Lamb, detained on board the British government brig Beaver, then lying in this harbour. The captain refused obedience to the writ, and, in half an hour after it was served, got under weigh and proceeded down the river. An order in the mean time was issued by the judge to attach the captain, with which the deputy sheriff went along side in a boat, but being threatened to be fired upon, retired. Time will not permit us to make any comment on this outrageous insolence—It might have been expected that the sight of Jackson's lines would have recalled the idea that our laws and our rights are not to be infringed with impunity.—But measures we understand have been adopted to prevent the passage of the brig out of the river, and no doubt can be entertained that the captain will be punished as he deserves.—Orleans Gaz.

TALLEYRAND.

The following outline of this extraordinary being it thus drawn by Lady Morgan, in her new work on France:

"I had frequently seen this celebrated personage and future historical character at court; upon other public occasions in the bustle of processions, at the nuptial pomp of royalty, under the holy dome of Notre Dame, at the deepest tragedy, at the liveliest comedy, amidst the solemnity of the royal chapel and the revelry of the feasting court; but I saw him always the same cold, motionless; not abstracted but unoccupied; not absent but unmoved; no feature varying the colouriess hue of his lived complexion, no expression marking its character on his passive countenance. His figure seemed the shell of a human frame, emptied of its organic arrangements: or if the heart beat or the brain vibrated, no power of penetration could reach the results of the one, or guess at the working of the other. From the mind of this man the world seemed contemptuously shut out; and if this most impassible form and face indicated character or opinion, one would have thought at the first glance, this is surely the being who has said, speech was given to man to conceal his thoughts.' It seemed as if the intimacy of love, the confidence of friendship, the community of counsel, could never draw the man to the countenance, which, amidst all the vicissitudes, versality, changes, and contrasts in the life of its owner, had never been.

'A book in which men read strange things.'
It was indeed a book, written in a dead language."

NEW-YORK, September 20.

CLEOPATRA'S BARGE.—The brig ee, captain Springsteen, arrived this morning from Barcelona. On entering the port of Barcelona, Capt. S. spoke the Cleopatra's Barge, going out, with her owner, George Crowningshield, esq. on a tour of pleasure in the Mediterranean. Capt. S. was credibly informed at Barcelona, that this beautiful vessel had been visited by upwards of eighteen thousand persons during her very short stay of 4 days at that place, and was obliged to leave the port sooner than Mr. C. otherwise intended, on account of the immense number of people who flocked from all quarters to see her. The Captain Gen. of the province, Castanos, and staff; intendant's family; foreign consuls, resident at Barcelona; many of the nobility; chief magistrates of the city; officers of the army and navy; ladies of the first rank and distinction, and even friars, were among the number of those whose curiosity was attracted by this rare specimen of American taste and genius.

General Bernard.—A late number of the Mobile Gazette, pays the following just & respectful tribute to this officer, in announcing his visit and duties as engineer, &c. "We were a few days since favored with a visit from general Bernard, a distinguished Frenchman, and an eminent engineer. He a short time since, held a conspicuous situation under Napoleon, and is now in the service of the U. S. We understand that he has visited under the direction of the government, all the passes by which an enemy may approach the state of Louisiana from the ocean, and that his visit here was for a similar purpose. He also inspects all the forts and defensible positions, and we learn it to be his decided opinion, that the fort in the town of Mobile is unnecessary. We hope the government will join him in opinion, as the removal of the fort will tend very much to the beauty and convenience of this place."

From the Augusta, (Geo.) Herald, Sept. 9.

At the late term of our superior court in Columbia county, a man, we understand, was indicted for killing a negro, by excess of severity in inflicting punishment upon him; he was found guilty of manslaughter, and was branded in the hand in open court, in pursuance of the sentence passed upon him, in conformity to law for his offence.

It is a fact, that Major General Brown, of the United States army, who accompanied President Monroe to Pittsburgh, passed through Lebanon on Friday last on a tour thro' the State of Pennsylvania, and while there, inquired of his landlord who he was going to vote for Governor, who replied that he intended voting for Findlay.—Then, said he, I have been particular in my inquiries along the road, and you are the first man at whose house I have stopped since I left Washington, (in Penn.) who was not friendly to the election of General Hiester!

Lancaster Journal.

FRENCH GALLANTRY.—In almost all the provincial theatres, there are certain customs established and consecrated by French gallantry, which the pit, on most occasions, enforces with inflexible severity. A man who, even before the rising of the curtain, is so impolite as to keep his hat on in a place where ladies are seated, or who being in front of a box, does not immediately rise to offer his seat to the lady who enters, is instantly reprimanded by the pit, which in some manner exercises the vigilance and authority of a high police. It appears that the supreme authority of the pit was disregarded at Nantes, on a late occasion, and that the Mayor felt it his duty to support that authority. He sent forth a public order recognizing the ancient usage prescribed by convenience, and enforcing its strict observance.

FASHIONABLE PANTALOONS.

Not long since, a slim spark bespoke a pair of pantaloons at a French tailor's. "be sure" (said he) "to make them VERY FULL." "Yes Sare, I understand you very well; tank you Sare, your custom will make me to much honneur"—tendering him the homage of a profound bow.—When the pantaloons were brought home, how was he disappointed to find them of the same dimensions as the skin! He stamped, swore, and raved at the tailor and the whole French nation; during which, the poor tailor stood in a corner, with his hands clasped, uttering "Mon Dieu! Mon Dieu!" in the utmost consternation.—"Did I not give you particular directions to make them large?" "Large! no Sare, you say FULL; and suppose he is LARGE, I believe he is very EMPTY."

MUSCULAR STRENGTH.

Smollet, in his travels in Italy, remarks, that a porter in London quenches thirst with a draught of strong beer; a porter of Rome or Naples refreshes himself with a slice of water melon, or a glass of iced water. The one costs three halfpence, and the last a farthing----which of them are most effectual? I am sure the men are equally well pleased. It is commonly remarked that beer strengthens as well as refreshes; but the porters of Constantinople, who never drink any thing stronger than water, and eat very little animal food, will carry a load of 700 weight, which is more than any English porter ever attempted to raise.
